Not illustrated. 1906 Excerpt: . . . and the reek of perspiring men, streaked by the odour of cooking oil, of incense, and of putrid fish. It is an aggressive smell. It strikes upon the senses as a crash of discordant sound beats upon the ear. It is cruel in its persistence, and as horrible in its suggestion of suffocation as if invisible fingers were clutching at the throat. No little of the vileness of this acrid stench comes from certain creeks which crawl through the city. They are crossed now and then by narrow stout: bridges. From the parapet of the bridge one looks down upon no prattling rivulet, no Venetian canal, but upon a gutter of black mud, and a slimy track bestrewed with pots and pans, dead animals, rotting rags, and the general offal of the town. The filth oozes sea-ward as if it were the dark blood of a...
