The following resume of the opinions of eminent physicians and specialists on the effects of alcohol, expressed in recent years, and for the most part published in The Journal of the American Medical Association, will doubtless be of interest to many readers. All italics are mine. CONCLUSIONS OF STORK. The conclusions reached by Stork are: Small quantities of alcohol favor salivary and gastric digestion; but that large quantities inhibit all digestive functions. Alcohol, whiskey, gin and brandy are less harmful to digestion, perhaps, than are malt liquors and wines; but the continuous use of alcohol in any form, even in small quantities, is liable to prove detrimental to digestive processes. In persons of weak digestion alcohol is harmful, unless given very well diluted. It should never be given when the stomach is empty. It is sometimes of value in disease, requiring no primary assimilation. It yields force readily to an exhausted system and in small quantities promotes appetite. CLASSIFICATION OP FRENCH. French in treating of hereditary alcoholism, divides the cases into three classes: 1st. It may be direct, as where there is a susceptibility or craving for it, transmitted from one generation to another, the form remaining substantially the same. This is not uniform among children and it may skip a generation. Persons with such heredity cannot be moderate drinkers, and can only escape inebriety by avoiding alcohol entirely. 2nd. It may be indirect, as where ineinebriety in the parent,...
